Military doctors in the U.S. are often the first to arrive on scene when a service member is injured in a war zone and are the last to leave when their patient is alive and well. They're also among the first members of society to discuss one of the most important parts of their patients: an intimate conversation about the burden of military service. "The focus is [on] what happened to you, not what you did," said Dr. Mitchell Magyar, a clinical psychologist with the medical center at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington. "Often the soldiers talk more about things that happened than if there had been a war. They have a lot of traumatic experiences in their life." Magyar, a retired lieutenant colonel, has been an active duty doctor for 36 years in the Air Force and is now the director of a military psychology program. He has counseled service members suffering from post-traumatic stress, mental health issues and traumatic brain injuries. The problem with some soldiers is that they don't have the proper counseling as they transition home from war, he said. "It can take anywhere from two months to a year," he said. "That's one of the lessons we learned in the Vietnam War — our soldiers need counseling just as much as our veterans did when they returned home." Soldiers and their families also rarely discuss the burden of war with one another, he said. They're in a difficult period as they transition home. "You have to be very careful of what you say," Magyar said. "Do you want to say, 'I'm so proud to be out of combat'?" He knows many soldiers who still are grappling with the human cost of their wounds. "They're trying to balance their emotions and their personality, trying to be functional," he said. "There are a lot of gaps in their mind." The healing process takes time, Magyar said, so many soldiers wait until they return home to begin discussing their injuries. "You may have somebody who just doesn't
